policy for achieving both a higher level of production and income as well as better distributive justice.

It was noted that despite the ban on tenancy and absentee landlordism, cultivation by leasing lands continued flourish under concealed and informal tenancy arrangements in several places. Detection of oral and informal tenents was therefore a major challange. It was felt that a strict definition of 'Personal cultivation' should also be implemented so as to bring all the oral and informal tenants on record, and prevent circumvention of the land reform policy.

On the issue of land ceilings, there was a general agreement that the existing ceiling limiis as approved in the national guidelines of 1972, should be strictly enforced in all the States. Exemptions in general including those relating to educaiional and charitable institutions should be done away with.

The situation with regard to the present condition of land records was recognised as requiring urgent attention in view of the growing and prolonged litigation. It was recommended that a major plan scheme to be taken up for updating the land record and strengthening the revenue machinery.
